GRIN Verlag. Paperback. Book Condition: New. Paperback. 60 pages. Dimensions: 8.3in. x 5.8in. x 0.1in. Seminar paper from the year 2005 in the subject American Studies - Culture and Applied Geography, grade: B, The George Washington University, 6 entries in the bibliography, language: English, abstract: I am an international student from Germany; therefore, I suppose it was unavoidable that I would have to face some common stereotypes about Germans. Is it true that every German wears Lederhosen and Do all Germans eat Sauerkraut and drink beer all day were only two of the many questions I was asked shortly after moving to DC and meeting my fellow students. As I was thinking of a reasonable answer to these queries, I soon realized that I am not conforming to the stereotypes many people have about Germans. Ive never worn lederhosen (leather trousers) before, nor do I like to drink beer. Nevertheless, I was born in Germany and am, therefore, German. This contradiction between social expectations and my reality made me think about another fascinating inconsistency about college students in the States: college drinking. As teenagers leave their familiar surroundings, say goodbye to their family and friends and move away to college, they face the new experience of living with complete strangers, they are challenged to take on new responsibilities, and must study independently. The life lessons one experiences during college are probably the most formative and important ones of a persons life. Tapping into ones academic brilliance is crucial for further success in ones private and professional lives, yet often, college students have a habit of engaging in binge drinking. Why would students behave like this when it is common knowledge that every time one consumes excessive amounts of alcohol, brain cells are killed, and that excessive drinking over a long period...
